Getting your wedding online

In the digital age, wedding websites are growing in popularity and can deliver much more than just information concerning your big day. Having a wedding website can help reduce the stress in organising a wedding by helping you to provide your guests with information as well as allowing you to gather information have a head start on "who's who" on the day. Other important information which usually gets crammed in to an envelope with the wedding invitations can be easily published online. This information is always readily available and can not be lost, saving you the headache of dealing with endless phone calls asking for the same information.

with the locality with further useful information.

Most importantly a website can provide last minute news or schedule changes or even a weather forecast for the day. This versatility in providing information can save you time as well as the cost of postage, phone calls and text messaging.

Information can be submitted by your guests through your website via web forms and collected into an email account. Such information may include special dietary requests for the meal, or music requests for the evening reception. You can include a guestbook and allow your guests to leave their best wishes or publish a wedding gift list with links to your favorite gift shops.

Having your own website for your wedding is a fun way to share the build up to your big day with family and friends wherever they are in the world. After your wedding, you can recreate the event especially for those who could not make it on the day, by sharing photos videos or comments.

Finally, you can use your wedding website to provide a big thank you to all those involved in making your big day special.
